years, (nineteen too many, as there are other varieties for culture) from a specimen l'obtained of Doct. Nourse of Hallowell."-" B," in the Courier of Nov. 5th The Chenango, then, has been cultivated "2") years-19 too many!" If this be really true, now happens it that the Chenango has been caltivated for market, more extensively than all other kinds? Demand and price, are the universa! law they governs production. Farmers who cultivate for their own table, can consult their own taste as to kinds, but it they cultivate to sell, they made adapt their produce to the mar-+kct. "There is no disputing," it is said, "about laste, and truly it is said, if you undertake to dispute with an Irishman about his potatotaste. In the fall of 1836, I shipped a number of cargoes of potatoes, South. In one cargo, shipped to Baltimere, there happened to be, directly under the harches, a few hundred bushels, slightly mixed with Whites, the bulk being Chenangoes The slight mixture, of perhaps a twentieth part, prevented a sale by the carren, and the master had to dispose of them at retail, in the small quantity of a pack, half bushel, or bushel, to persons that could buy in no larger quantity;and after paying for their purchase, poor as most of them seemed to be, they would empty their potatives upon deck, and, selecting out all but the Chenangoes, throw them into the dock. In this way, and by this class of purchasers, some 25 or 30 bushels were thrown overboard. In the sama cargo was 500 bushed, old English Whites, which sold for 5 with per bushed, while the Chenangues sold for 55 to 62 cents per bushel. At that time, as I have no doubt now, our author's favorite 'Jacksons,' and his brood of un-tchristened nurselings, would share the same fate. Has the market changed? has the Chemanyo gane out of use? is there no demand for them? As a common market potato, the Chenango stands pre-eminent abuve all others. Why, then, should the tarmer abandon its culture, as his been recommended? He should Do farmers in general understand how to cuiivate the Chenango to get a good crop? This is a more important question for the farmer's consideration, that what has been the cause of the rot the past season. The Lot may never troub a us again, while the crop we want crety year.-Our nuthor says of the Chiquango: "Tueir tops, fare comparatively light in their best days, & their falore from rot the past Brason, mole than any other kind, may be mainly attributed to the lack of this indispensable protection; by being expised to the baking process of the hot days and nights of September." The Chenaugo has other peculiarities besides light tops, but they are all natural, and should be studied, understond and regarded by the cultivator. It is natural for the tober of the Chenango to grow very near the surface, and very often to show themselv sabave ground. It is natural for the Chenango to have very light tops; they come out of the ground in single stears, and do not branch like the long Reds and some ciners; and these single, slender branches, as the senson advances become more profasely loaded with large clusfters of polane-balls, than any other arrely, and the weight of these balls causes the light stems to bend outward, leaving the growing tubers "exp sed to the baking process of the hot days and nights of September." But all this is natthology, to explain the origin and government of ural, and the man who plants the Chenansothe world, the destray of man in this hie, and deep, or hills high at hoeing time, to make the heast the after death. The billet and measien light tops stand opright, with the view of protertained by the early Semdinavians on these teet no the tubers from the sun sorting process, points may be found deta-led in an ancient work leading to the tubers from the sun s baking process, entitled the Elda.
